FAIR PLAY AND RESPONSIBILITY IN ONLINE CHESS

The COVID-19 pandemic propelled chess into the online space, allowing both veteran and new players to engage more freely. Online platforms attracted top players like FMs, IMs, and GMs to stream their games, sharing insights and even humor about their moves, making chess more accessible and motivating for others. While online play fosters improvement through learning from mistakes, it also introduces negative behaviors. Some players focus on winning through time pressure tactics or resort to unfair means like engine use, sandbagging, and outside help.

Fair play is crucial to maintaining the essence of chess. Players must embrace the learning process, understanding that losses and mistakes are the real teachers. Cheating might offer short-term wins but undermines personal growth and the spirit of the game. As technology continues to advance, cheat detection becomes more sophisticated, ensuring that dishonesty will eventually be exposed. The choice lies with each player: to win with integrity or compromise their chess journey.

September is a significant month in Indian chess history, marked by key milestones such as Viswanathan Anand's rise in the 1980s, particularly his achievement in September 1987 when he secured a top finish in the World Junior Chess Championship, paving the way for his title as India's first Grandmaster. The Chess Olympiad, often held in September, saw India share the gold medal with Russia in the 2020 Online Olympiad, a historic moment for Indian chess. Additionally, in September 2017, Bharat Singh Chauhan was elected to a key FIDE position, enhancing India's influence in the global chess scene.
